VAN GOGH – Café Terrace at Night

The new colour of the Van Gogh collection is inspired by the Café Terrace at Night, painted by the Dutch artist in Arles, France, in 1888. In one of his letters, the painter wrote:

"I have been interrupted by the very work that a new painting of the outside of a café at night has been giving me these last few days. On the terrace there are small figures of people drinking. An enormous yellow lantern illuminates the terrace, the facade, the pavement, and also casts light on the cobblestones of the street, which take on a pinkish-purple hue. The gables of the houses on a street receding under a blue sky studded with stars are dark blue or purple, with a green tree".

The painting in question is characterised by a relaxed, almost dreamy stroke, in contrast with the usual nervous, fragmented brushstrokes, due to the serenity of this night in the French South. Once again the artist relies completely on colours to convey his feelings and in this case he chooses the contrast between yellow, orange, blue and green, which are taken up by Visconti for the creation of the new Van Gogh Café Terrace at Night.
